In a time when reality has become optional, standing by biological truth has somehow become a revolutionary act. If you're looking for comfort, you won't find it here. But if you want truth—raw, unfiltered, and backed by both logic and lived experience—keep reading.

We are living through a cultural coup where language is weaponized, facts are denied, and those who dare to speak up are vilified. What was once considered obvious—that women are adult human females—is now considered hate speech in some corners of the internet and the institutional left. But thankfully, some people still have the spine to say no more.

Take billionaires like Elon Musk and J.K. Rowling—people with everything to lose. These aren't anonymous trolls hiding behind keyboards; they're global icons standing in the firing line of cancel culture to say the same thing I've been saying for years: women's rights are not up for negotiation. They've stood firm while mobs smear them, activists deface property with swastikas on Teslas, and extremists paint Nazi symbols on their own bodies to protest basic biology. You can't make this lunacy up.

But even more inspiring to me than Musk or Rowling are the female athletes who've risked everything—careers, scholarships, reputations—to protest what can only be described as trans lunacy. Women like Riley Gaines and Stephanie Turner, who just wanted a fair chance to compete, now find themselves targeted by a vicious outrage machine that demands total submission to its ideology.

They didn't cave. They didn't conform. They took a knee—literally and figuratively—for truth. And for that, they are heroes.

My Own Personal Costs for Speaking the Truth

I've lost good friends over this issue. That's the cost of staying grounded in reality while others get high on ideology. What's more painful is how my own kids have been weaponized against me—pawns in a culture war they never ed to be part of.

ex-wife is now married to a "trans man." Is that a transsexual or a transvestite? I'm honestly not sure anymore. definitions shift like sand under a tide of political correctness. What I do know is this: just because someone ntifies a certain way doesn't mean I'm obligated to pretend biology doesn't exist. And it certainly doesn't mean I stop fighting for my daughters' right to safe, female-only spaces, or my son's right to know the difference between male and female.

I've always supported gay rights. That's a matter of record—20+ years of blog posts, videos, and social media receipts. I protested when California tried to end gay marriage back in 2008. That history is documented here. But supporting gay rights doesn't require me to abandon the truth.

You can stand with the gay community and defend women's spaces. These aren't contradictory positions unless you're living in a world where basic definitions get rewritten by Twitter mobs and DEI consultants.

The Math Doesn't Lie

Dr. Jordan Peterson recently weighed in on this madness. He recounted how a Disney executive once proudly claimed she had two kids—one trans, one pansexual. Statistically, Peterson broke it down: the odds of having one trans kid are around 1 in 3,000, and pansexuality is even rarer. The combined probability? Roughly 1 in 9 million.

Now, compare that with the odds of being a narcissist virtue-signaling your children's identities to win social points: significantly higher. As Peterson concluded, maybe these aren't organic expressions of identity. Maybe this is the result of parental projection and cultural grooming, not some innate biological truth.

Peterson's words hit home. According to the latest rebranding of my own family dynamic, 4 out of 5 of my kids are now some variation of this new trend. That's statistically impossible unless we've created a cultural petri dish where identity is molded by ideology, not nature.

This Isn't Hate. It's Love for Truth.

To my children, and to everyone who questions my motives: I'm not doing this because I'm hateful. I'm doing this because I love you—and I refuse to lie to you. Saint Augustine said it best:

> "Right is right even if no one is doing it; wrong is wrong even if everyone is doing it."

It's easier to go along. It's safer to stay quiet. But truth isn't always easy or safe. Sometimes it costs you everything. And if that's the price I pay for defending women's sports, prison safety, and the integrity of language, then so be it.

Real-World Consequences

s isn't just about sports. It's about what happens when you let ideology rewrite reality:

- Biological males housed in women's prisons, resulting in documented cases of rape and abuse.
- 900 medals won by trans-identified male athletes in women's competitions, as confirmed by a UN study.
- Girls losing scholarships, spots on teams, and their dignity—while being told they're bigots for speaking up.

These aren't hypotheticals. These are real people, real lives, and real consequences. And yet, the woke industrial complex keeps telling us to sit down and shut up.

No thanks.

Final Word: The Revolution Will Be Based in Reality

I'm not giving up on my kids. I'm not giving up on women. And I'm definitely not giving up on truth—no matter how uncomfortable it makes the world around me.

We didn't ask for this fight. But now that it's here, we've got two choices: conform or confront. I choose to confront. Because I'd rather lose everything standing for reality than gain the world by living a lie.

This is Ryan Thompson, the Punk Rock Libertarian. Standing against ideological tyranny. Standing for biology. And standing with the women, girls, and truth-tellers who refuse to be erased.
